He was a profound student of medical literature, up to the very end of his life, always abreast of the times, and keen to make use of every new method and discovery as it was brought forward. His devotion to his patients amounted almost to slavery--and he the slave--but this devotion and unselfish personal service, with his cheerful confidence and the merry twinkle in his eye, gained for him an esteem, an affection, and a loyalty, that only the best of the old-fashioned family physicians could inspire. In all his relations with his professional brethren, Dr. Wood carried into practice the golden rule, and he demanded an equally strict adherence to a high standard of professional ethics from others. He was kind, thoughtful of others, very sensitive of criticism, very loath to criticize others, and always ready to lend a...
