Excerpt: . . . containers in which these imported food items are transported must be marked with country of origin. Tariff Act rules also require that imported foods that are repackaged in consumer-ready packages must be marked with their country of origin. In April 1999 we issued a report that examined the potential implications and benefits of country-of-origin labeling for fresh produce. Our report noted that grocery stores usually know the country of origin of the imported produce that they display in open bins, because they have the marked boxes or cartons in which the items were imported. We noted that state inspectors in Florida, a state that requires country-of-origin labeling for imported fresh produce, checked shipping boxes against the labeling signs that grocers placed on produce bins to verify the accuracy of the labels. In our January 2000 report on the potential implications of country-of-origin labeling for muscle cuts of beef and lamb, we found that meat packers and processors did not routinely maintain country-of-origin information on imported meat as required under the Tariff...
