In these the artist appears to have done his best (or worst) to outdo his predecessor or contemporary worker in the extravagant use of forms, proper only to the painter or picture-maker, till it touched what was perhaps its highest point of absurdity, in the wooden representation of whole towns, castles, etc. We see these illustrated in the German work of the eighteenth century on panels used chiefly for the interior decoration of cabinets. The French work of the eighteenth century is every whit as extravagant as that of Germany in another way. There is a small table in the Jones Collection at the South Kensington Museum the top of which is decorated with Boule work (metal and ivory). In the plan of the decoration a...
