My Niece, Mistress Katherine Delaval. Comet come, sir: be not over-modest, look on her. Bowls was a favourite pastime at Brodelay Hall, and as soon as the weather permitted, Katherine was instructed in the mysteries of the game. She had never seen it played; but whatever mortification had attended her first efforts in other directions, there was none here. She had a correct eye, a strong arm, and displayed at once an aptitude for grasping the salient points set forth by her instructors, of whom Charles Ingham was the chief. So quickly did she progress, indeed, that there came a day when Mr. Hetherington turned with his lowest bow to his young friend. Congratulations, Charles; your admonitions have been crowned with such success that in my poor judgment they may be dispensed with in future. If there is one person present less in need of them than another, it is my fair niece, your latest and most promising pupil. The words, uttered with a certain deliberation, fell clearly on the ear of a person for whom they were not intended, but who unperceived was within a few yards of the speaker. A horseman had ridden up and dismounted behind the tall holly hedge within which the bowling-green was snugly enclosed, and Sir Jasper St. Osyth, who had his own reasons for making observations before revealing his presence when so good an opportunity offered, now took a keen and rapid survey of...
